

Professor Clancy has a PhD degree in cancer bioinformatics from the University of Oslo. He has an immunological background developing computational immune-profiling methods, in several national and international cancer related projects. He has more than 18 years experience in bioinformatics and 14 years of commercial experience in bioinformatics product development. He has an active scientific profile in applying immune informatics for biomarker discovery in cancer & infectious diseases. He currently also serves as Professor at Nagasaki University, in the Vaccine Informatics department, through a cross appointment with NEC OncoImmunity.